Out of World War One came a fair body of poetry. Generally, they fell into two categories. During the first few years of the war, the poems tended to have a patriotic flavour while the latter years and after the war, the poems tended to reflect an anti-war tone. Our poem this year is different as it is humorous. It was written by Banjo Patterson (1864-1941) who served in the war and was noted for writing the words of the unofficial Australian national anthem "Waltzing Matilda." To anyone having served in the military "Swinging the Lead" will be all too familiar. Swinging the lead means 'dogging it', "skiving off", in other words avoiding doing some of the less attractive chores of military life such as "fatigues" or even avoiding required duty.

1. Penmanship – Cursive write (not print) the following paragraph:

Swing the Lead

Said the soldier to the Surgeon, 'I've got noises in me head
And a kind o' filled up feeling after every time I'm fed;
I can sleep all night on picket, but I can't sleep in my bed.'
And the Surgeon said,
'That's Lead!'

Said the soldier to the Surgeon, 'Do you think they'll send me back?
For I really ain't adapted to be carrying a pack
Though I've humped a case of whiskey half a mile upon my back?
And the Surgeon said, 'That's Lead!'

So they sent him to the trenches where he landed safe and sound,
And he drew his ammunition, just about two fifty round:
'Of Sergeant, what's this heavy stuff I've got to hump around?'
And the Sergeant said,
'That's Lead!'
